- 1. Arguments are necessary
- 2. Social training
- 3. Family is a top priority
- 4. New tendency in family meals
- 5. No more stress in life

- A. If you find family meals tense and unpleasant, you're not alone. The nation's eating habits have changed and many families no longer eat together on a regular basis. To be honest, this doesn't strike me as particularly surprising. Lunchtime last Sunday in my own home consisted of my two-year-old son happily throwing his food on the floor whilst yet again his older brother and sister protested loudly about the vegetables they were being made to eat. Despite the noise and chaos, though, we still prefer to have meals as a family. On weekdays that's difficult as there are too many things going on and there just isn't enough time for me and my wife to sit with the children at breakfast. Only our youngest is with his mother for lunch and the children's supper is too early for me to participate. But we do our best at weekends.
- B. If, as some research shows, parents now talk to their children for an average of just 12 minutes a day, then our decision to eat together as much as possible is more than justified. Whilst the quality of the kitchen table chat is not particularly high a mixture of bad jokes, song lyrics and gossip — we are at least communicating, which is the main thing, so it doesn't matter to me what the topic of conversation is.
- C. Of course, family meals can be tense and we don't always see eye to eye. But for me arguing together is an essential part of family life and all part of learning to get on with each other.
- D. Gerry, a 35-year-old father of two young girls, would not agree. He had enough of stressful family meals as a child and now sees them as both impractical and undesirable. "I hardly ever get home early enough to eat with my kids, but I don't particularly mind that. It has a lot to do with my own childhood memories.

Mealtimes were very formal occasions, and they provided my parents with the opportunity to interrogate me about everything I'd done that day. I used to feel very uncomfortable. Later, during my teenage years, the meal table became the scene of terrible rows. Of course, I'd like to spend less time rushing around and more time with my family, but I don't miss family meals at all."

- E. Andrew finds family meals difficult, but necessary. "We're always having rows, particularly when the kids start moaning about what's on their plate," he says. "Trying to keep everyone happy isn't easy, especially with three children under nine who all have different tastes and a teenage stepdaughter who would much rather be eating her dinner on the sofa in front of the TV. But eating with others is an important social skill. I want my children to get used to doing it in the home so that they will know how to eat in public."
- F. James, the father of two teenage boys, says: "The older my kids become, the less contact I have with them and the more important family meals become. They're often the only opportunity we get to talk." As a traveling sales representative, James is responsible for his own time management and he tries to organize his appointments in such a way that he can return to his Liverpool home in time for dinner with his family at 7.00 pm. "We made it a priority," he says, "because I feel that mealtimes are an important point of family contact."
